Doctor (Medical Profession)-Patient (Public) Relations

The doctor-patient relationship is an important one, not only to individuals but also to the medical profession and to the public.

The doctor of medicine, in the interest of good relations, (1) must carefully survey the patient's needs, (2) must explain the care he will render, and (3) must fully explain the cost. In like manner, the medical profession, at local, state, and national levels, must adequately study the public's needs and attitudes at frequent intervals, must report what medicine is achieving, and must explain medical care and service costs.

This analogy was suggested in a talk by Albert V. Whitehall, director of health insurance of the Life Insurance Association of America, at a meeting of the Florida Society of Internal Medicine recently.

Just as the patient is continually judging his doctor, so is the community sizing up the medical group as a whole. The greater percentage of individual doctors who satisfy their patients, the more favorable will be over-all public relations attitude. In addition to seeing that their individual relations are in order, however, physicians need to work through various professional organizations in order to create good will collectively.

Each medical society should be alert to the health needs and to other problems that may confront the public. It should then face up to the problems by ascertaining the cause and should make plans to correct the deficiencies, some of which may lie with the physicians themselves. By
